Modern Leather Goods

Bossy Gets a Makeover. This bustling enterprise will relatively rapidly and with highish but seemingly fair prices repair or renovate that precious leather suitcase given you by Cousin Aldo before he left to serve time, or that handbag in which you've stored the essential private equipment for nights out. The walls have the usual testimonials from celebrities at once equally careless and affectionate about their leather, and from behind the desk at which you supplicate the manager for rescue for your Ratty Precious you can observe a workroom of brisk folk industriously manhandling the skins of ex-animals.

Good leather objects are expensive, if you haven't noticed, and while repairing them extracts noticeable funds from your current account, it is also the case that good leather objects inspire a kind of intrinsic affection, so you will probably pay up just to enjoy them for another five years. Our Il Bisonte bag that was at least 10 years old has been given monkey-gland shots and should continue as our traveling companion for another five at least. It was $125 for the treatment. It'd be about $650 for a new bag—which, anyway, they don't make anymore in just that special way.
